Living With a Bruxer For a few months now, I've had a new patient, one who comes in four times a week to have her teeth cleaned and who "brushes her teeth every other day" (her words). She is a nice woman, we joke about her, and she was genuinely concerned about my advice as she chose a dentist who was young and exuberant, with a big smile and long hair. The trouble is that I had to be out of town for a trip the week she came in for her first cleaning. I was the only dentist in town. The office agreed to break in the dentist I had recommended to this patient, and came to my office to see if I could get them to see the patient. As we discussed the problem, the young dentist began to talk about herself and her kids, so I thought that the reason for this patient's visit had just become more important to her. He had only seen her two-three times, but they were getting along well. He was starting to believe she was the kind of patient who didn't get upset easily. He had arranged for her to come in for a first cleaning, and told her he would try to bring her in every other week. They couldn't commit to more than that, though, but they did know they would be coming to the office in a couple of weeks. A couple of days after he came back to my office, he told me that his patient had called to cancel. Her appointment was now scheduled for the following week. "What?!?!" I exclaimed. "That's a real problem," I said. "I've already seen her and she's told me how important it was to have her first cleaning and now I'm out of town when she's going to have to wait two weeks?" So, I can't say what happened in that follow-up call. But what I can say, with certainty, is that one of the things I was working on during that week was quitting.
