This tool works like this: When you start the program the screen "LAN Online Checker" appears. This window contains a menu: Next, you can press OK or Cancel to continue immediately or close the tool. Clicking on the image of the currently connected computer will bring up the main window. This window has a button to bring up another window for checking if there are other connected computers. Here you will find all currently connected computers in the network, how long they have been connected and a button to disconnect the currently displayed computer. If a computer is currently connected, the program appears in a small, green bar with the blue background, otherwise it appears in the small, gray bar. You can change the current status via the application settings. Software piracy is theft of computer software. Using the information, a pirate obtains the software, often at a substantial discount, redistributes it, and often gives it away for free. The practice undermines the market for legitimate software by decreasing the supply of popular, and often expensive, programs. Most software pirated is produced without a license or legal approval. Additionally, software generally costs money, so piracy allows software piracy to be a secondary business, rather than a primary one (Mollas et al. 1990, p. 5). Therefore, many computer users are uncomfortable buying pirated software. Some, however, may have no other option, or choose to purchase pirated software anyway. Definition In the case of software publishers, the term software piracy encompasses both stealing copyrighted computer software and violating licenses. When stealing copyrighted software, pirates are violating the rights of the software publisher. This involves the theft of software, and is also referred to as software theft. Software license violation, is different from software theft. This involves non-stealing and is also referred to as software pirating. Strikingly, though most software publishers, software pirates, and software users view software theft and software piracy as two different practices, they are not. They are not different practices because they both involve the act of taking something someone else owns and using it without paying for it. Rather, they are different practices because of their different intentions. Software theft involves the intent to obtain something for free whereas software piracy intends to deprive others of their right to the software. In some cases, they may be different acts. For example, someone can steal a telephone or a car and then give it away. If another person takes the telephone or car, he or she may not
