She was inspired by the actress Anita Garvin. A popular image of the character is an image of her with a bowler hat on and holding a basket of flowers. Artist Hal Bennett created the character in 1940. The doll version of Honey Bunny was created in 1942 and marketed by Aaron's Inc. The doll came with a monogrammed dildo. History She first appeared in the comic strip Little Orphan Annie in the Sept. 26, 1940, issue, as one of Annie's school friends. The character was a reference to Billie Burke, the blonde Hollywood star of silent films who was popular at the time. She was developed into an animated character by George Brett and appeared in both animated and live-action shorts for many years. She also appeared in guest appearances on radio programs such as Fibber McGee and Molly. Honey Bunny dolls were produced by Aaron's Inc. from 1942 to 1972, when the company was accused of pedophilia and the toys were pulled from the market. The dolls were marketed under the alternate brand names Baby-Blue Buddies, Fur Babies, Junior-Blue Buddies, and Teen-Blue Buddies. The heads were designed to look like a rock-hard, just-out-of-jail, teenage boy named Gil Norton. Honey Bunny dolls are no longer available. Some fans have speculated that the development of the Elmo doll from the Sesame Street character in the early 1990 mitochondrial cytochrome oxidase I barcode markers in Sicilian bees. Because mitochondrial DNA (mtDNA) is maternally inherited, it is a useful source for reconstructing historical population dynamics. Thus, large-scale phylogenetic analysis of mtDNA in bees can reveal the origins and history of lineages and can be combined with genetic methods to detect potential bottlenecks, hybridization and admixture events. This study uses a bee taxonspecific primer set to screen for genetic variation within a population-based sample of honey bees from six regions of Sicily, Italy. The nt sequence of mitochondrial cytochrome oxidase I gene (COI) region was used to estimate genetic diversity in five different taxa of honey bees (Apis mellifera, Ceratina flavicrissa, Melipona beecheii, M. tetragolita and Osmia cornuta). The results of this study indicate very low levels of haplotypic variation within all the six bee species and a moderate diversity in C. flavicrissa. The differentiation among the taxa of bees in Sicily was substantial, with a few geographically widespread haplotypes and a high level of haplotypic diversity in M. tetragolita. The low level of diversity in Sicily was corroborated by the low N(e) values (between 0.56 and 0.76) estimated for this population. This study provides a first barcode perspective on bees in Sicily, and results are discussed with reference to the effects of population size and geographic distances on genetic diversity and effective population size.
