More Details: prospective cohort study on the hospital readmission of heart failure patients: risk factors, clinical consequences, and costs. Hospital readmission of heart failure (HF) patients is a complex issue in clinical, financial, and health policy terms. Identification of readmission risks and their impact on clinical outcomes and healthcare costs is a challenge. Therefore, the aim of the present study was to identify all-cause and HF-related risk factors for hospital readmission and to evaluate their impact on clinical outcomes and costs. In this prospective cohort study, data were collected via standardized patient-reported questionnaires and medical records during three visits to the outpatient clinic of a German heart center. A total of 319 patients with HF (162 men, 67 women; mean age, 66 ± 12 years) were included. After a median of 215.9 days, hospital readmission due to all-cause and HF-related reasons occurred in 63.3% (95% confidence interval, 56.0-70.3%). Independent risk factors of all-cause readmission were male gender, high body mass index, and systolic dysfunction, but not New York Heart Association (NYHA) class or left ventricular ejection fraction. Single predictors of all-cause readmission included male gender, systolic dysfunction, and renal dysfunction. NYHA class and the presence of pulmonary hypertension were only predictors of HF-related readmission. Predictors of cardiovascular death and HF-related death were male gender, renal dysfunction, and cardiac insufficiency, as well as the presence of pulmonary hypertension, peripheral artery disease, NYHA class, and left ventricular ejection fraction. Readmission was associated with increased numbers of emergency room visits (P Continuing its work in expanding the applications for its FoxTRO signal analy

Why We're Positive About Crypto The latest crypto project to go under the microscope is a glorified instant messenger. Fun fact: Telegram, the app, is named after a 19th century Russian revolutionary. Seriously. The Telegram ICO was hyped up for months by VC-backed bullshit sites like The Coin Times and Brian Kelly's BKCM. It was the most hyped ICO of the year, and was touted as the biggest ICO of all time. The press was all over it, but the ICO crapped out in less than an hour. The failure of the Telegram ICO sent crypto into its usual post-ICO slumber, and the price of crypto dropped like a rock. On a day in which the entire crypto market was down 10% percent since last week's big surge, the Telegram ICO has risen nearly 50% since the ICO's epic failure. It's important to remember that not all ICOs are created equal. Some will crash and burn, while others will turn into the next DAO. We're highlighting the positive side of the coin, and trying to explain how an ICO can be a great use of capital for blockchain startups. Remember, ICO's and crypto have both been in the news quite a bit recently. BKCM's Brian Kelly went on a massive ICO spree, pitching multiple darlings of the blockchain world. Just as it's

-- Meet the Squad of FUT Champions A new Champion FUT allows FUT players to create personalized squads featuring their favorite players at each level: from pro-level experts to the young talented emerging talents. Create the squad of your dreams in FUT Champions. The Squad Builder The Squad Builder allows players to design their own league and invite the players of their choosing to join up in four different types of game modes:

- 4-4-2 is a tactical formation and standard gameplay setup. The most versatile formation, ideal for offensive and defensive play, is a perfect platform to learn the game. We hope you'll get to play games as an offensive or defensive midfielder and that you will build your dream team, both offensively and defensively.
- 2-3-2 is the classic 2-3-2 formation, known for the main four defenders sitting in the middle of the pitch. The wide players play out in front, sometimes flanked by wingers in case of high pressing scenarios. The 2-3-2 can be an effective formation when one of the 4-4-2's options is not working out well.
- 3-4-3 is the most defensive formation. The three central defenders and two wingers (or, if more defensive ability is needed, four central defenders and two wingers) are more or less comfortable when defending, but they are not designed to score.
- 5-2-1 is the most offensive formation. The midfield line is the core of the team
