When the Brexit referendum first came into focus in November 2015, I predicted: “All the people who said they wanted to leave Europe in the early 2000s, have now changed their mind and want to stay.” I hoped that the decision on 23 June would go the other way, with most people staying and the Remain campaign winning. There are a number of reasons why people are in the mood to stay – some already mentioned and several more that I will list below:

1. There is no obvious alternative to European membership. British people are becoming much more insular in the last decade. In the main, they have rejected the idea of globalisation. They do not want their country to become part of the global order. This is not an argument against international trade. If the UK had been unwilling to trade with Europe, it could have blocked any free-trade agreement with the EU on that basis. If there were an increase in global trade, that would be a positive outcome. But there is no alternative to EU membership. The costs of opting out are still unknown but greater than the benefits that might accrue from leaving the EU. There is considerable support in the UK for remaining in Europe. Yes, free-trade agreements can be done outside of the EU, but they must be negotiated with every other member state. I was unable to find out what agreements were in place between the UK and the EU.
2. Nothing is certain Back in 2002, no-one could have foreseen the current crisis in the EU. An economic crisis of this magnitude could not be taken into account when it was decided to leave the EU. It is therefore not

To investigate the efficacy of different mass of different polydimethylsiloxanes (PDS) on antimicrobial activity of maxillary sinus. The experimental animal model of antimicrobial activity of maxillary sinus was established by the artificial puncture method. Ten eight-week-old SD rats were randomly divided into three groups, 5 mL of PDS or normal saline was injected into the right maxillary sinus of each rat after the model was established. The control group was treated with the same volume of saline. One rat from the control group died after the operation. All the other rats survived without any signs of distress or infection. Left maxillary sinus of each rat was punctured for demonstrating antimicrobial activity after the model was established.

Fifteen weeks after the operation, PDS suspensions were collected from the maxillary sinus, and different mass of PDS were prepared by spectrophotometry, respectively. Each group has five mice. The inside of the left maxillary sinus was injected with PDS suspension with an equal volume with right maxillary sinus, and the experimental group was divided into four groups of 100, 200, 400 and 800 microg/mL. Five mice were selected as experimental group each time. After the suspension was collected, broth dilution method was used to test the antimicrobial activity of PDS. After the investigation, five mice were selected from the control group as blank control, and they were injected with normal saline into the inside of left maxillary sinus. Five mice were selected from each experimental group and they were injected with the respective concentration of PDS suspensions into the inside of left maxillary sinus. After 1 week, the mice were sacrificed and the maxillary sinus was punctured for demonstrating its antimicrobial activity. No turbidity in all the PDS suspension was observed before incubation and after 24 hours incubation. The same mass of suspension showed a stable antimicrobial activity with time. The higher the concentration, the better the antibacterial activity. The results of the present study showed that different mass of PDS have different antimicrobial activity on the maxillary sinus, and the antimicrobial activity of the different mass of PDS is concentration-dependent.
