As always, in order to get this feature, you must create a custom grading profile. Just like with any other new or updated version of Lightroom, I have done that. I selected the RAW image, then opened the dialog window. I chose my custom skin and other settings to create my own end result. Satisfied, I saved the image, which created a new version in the photo library. I opened the RAW version and, sure enough, it was different than the version I'd created. As always, I did a bit of touch-up in Snapseed. Taking the file back into Lightroom, I selected the RAW, then opened Smart Preview. The result was the same: the final processed image looks different than the original. Smarter than I, I've since learned that there is a toggle for smoothing, so you can see the difference. If you have this smart preview feature turned on, the new image will be less sharp than the previous. In this case, the result is a little less crisp-looking. Lightroom 5 also has a much more powerful Edit Metadata. Like the "Smart Preview" feature, which features custom images, the Edit Metadata feature allows us to modify color spaces for images that were shot in the Adobe CalGray color space. On the plus side, the AI edits in Elements appear to have stabilized. There may have been some tweaks between the 2019 and 2020 releases, but overall, the emphasis on removing background noise from the images is stronger and seems more developmental than subtle. On auto modes, the tool's tendency to pick up on simple details (such as a shadow) and confuse things is somewhat longer-lived, but these are pretty minor quibbles.

How to Modify: The Filter Gallery option in the menu lists all the filters there are available and where they are on the timeline. The top-level category can be expanded by clicking on the Filter Gallery button. Once there, the filter you would like to apply will be in the recent list. Where to Find Them: Open the Edit menu and scroll down to the Fill and Adjustment Layers options. There will be a section on the right side just under the Layers options called Adjustment Layers that will list all of the adjustment layers you have created in the Timeline. How to Use Them: A lot of the adjustments we use are grouped under one different layer. Adjustment layers let you change the colors, effects, or clipping points of layers on a copy, duplicate or create layer. They are helpful for things like doing a quick and dirty cleanup of your photo, where you would want a clone layer applied to a new photo so that you could move the adjustments you made to content. Where to Find Them: You can drag the Adjustment Layers tab at the bottom of the Layers window so that you can access the Adjustment Layers dialog box. The dialog box will allow you to see all of the adjustments you have made so far. You can also use your keyboard to see the dialog box. For instance, if you press Control + Shift + I, you will see the dialog box. You can use the keyboard to highlight the adjustment you would like to edit and press the "I" key to select all of the adjustments on that layer or you can instead select the box around the adjustment and press the "X" key to clear it.
