Make your own work on it.Cable (Broadcast Satellite) August 2015 In my work as a broadcaster and as a consultant, I often meet with RCS/RDS (radio, television, internet and Voice over IP) system owners from around the world. From all of this work, the most common question that I get is how much bandwidth does such and such a system use? The most common response I get is that the answer is around 15 gigabytes per minute or less. And why is that, you might ask? It is not the bandwidth that is the problem. The problem is that the infrastructure used in broadcast transmission is being squeezed by everyone who has the need to get their video, audio and/or data out there. Each of these four systems are competing for the same infrastructure; causing contention for bandwidth on the last mile. It's really very simple, don't block up the backhaul pipe. If you have an access to capacity of 24 Mbps then it is reasonable to expect that you have a backhaul of 12 Mbps. So that gives you an average of a 4:1 ratio between the two. But those 12 Mbps may be shared by many other systems and they may have even greater demands on the pipe. So if you end up with a 6:1 ratio of needs, then you can assume that you have 3 Mbps of capacity. Now take this guess, and multiply it by the number of systems you have at your house or business and you will quickly realize how much capacity you need. A CATV system, carries its own video signal so that is different than the signal being distributed by broadcast stations. And a CATV system only needs a few gigabytes per second of bandwidth for its own signal. So when we talk about the ability of broadcast systems to compete with CATV systems we have to look at the two systems differently. When we deal with broadcast systems we have to look at what their broadcast requirements are. If a broadcaster has a need to broadcast an HD signal from a cable
