The effect of amino acids and glucose on biosynthesis of somatomedin C in the rat was investigated. A glucose control diet contained 0.67% of available nitrogen and 5.4 mM of glucose. A second diet was designed to contain 1.75% of available nitrogen and either no glucose (NGL), a physiologic concentration of glucose (10 mM), or a physiologic concentration of amino acids (2.5% L-alanine and 3.6% L-proline). The fourth diet was designed to contain 5.5% of available nitrogen and a physiologic concentration of amino acids (2.4% L-alanine and 3.6% L-proline) but no glucose. The in vivo biosynthesis of somatomedin C was measured by the ability of somatomedin C-depleted plasma to prevent posthemorrhagic hypovolemia. In the absence of glucose, all but one of the experimental diets significantly increased somatomedin C production (from 0.8 micrograms/d/kg to 2.2 micrograms/d/kg). The increase in biosynthesis was maximal when glucose was added to the diet, but the response was blunted by the presence of the amino acids. The greatest effect on biosynthesis was produced by the combination of amino acids and glucose, which increased somatomedin C production to 3.1 micrograms/d/kg. The ability of the amino acids to potentiate the effect of glucose was decreased by dietary amino acid deficiency, as estimated by decreases in the plasma amino acid concentration and in the biosynthesis of somatomedin C. Plasma amino acids and somatomedin C production showed a close positive relationship. That these studies may reflect an increase in somatomedin production is supported by the decreased hematocrit, plasma volume, and size of the hepatocytes observed after treatment with in vitro biosynthesis of somatomedin C. Design at the DTE Energy Design Center Quick Quotes "Minneapolis has many great qualities, but the downtown area is not one of them. Downtown is losing its 'gold' and gentrifying, with an oncoming wave of places to live. This has not translated to great public transportation
