The new Photoshop CS2/Elements batch processing toggle mechanism allows individual image adjustments to be conducted on all images in a batch, such as exposure, contrast, brightness and color. The key feature is the "filmstrip" overview of the process. Similar to Adobe's image-manipulation assistant in Photoshop right-click menus used to work.4 You generally set individual image adjustments for a group of images by adjusting a filter and then setting that filter for all the images in the current folder, including those not yet opened, or added to the folder. In the new interface, you create a new Filter Set called "All pix shot by you!" and copy the same filter to all the images. That filter then appears in the default list of available filters. While you can still check specific adjustments on "which" photos they are applied to, the new system is much more elegant if you aren't anxious to see them all. For me, I prefer the old system of filter sets and presets, as it enabled you go back and forth between the two quickly.5 If I liked the look of a particular preset or filter, I'd use that one for those images. Then I'd go back to using presets for the rest of the batch process, or modify the filter to fit the rest of the images. Regardless of the overall system, I still prefer to compare the benefits and drawbacks of individual filters and various adjustments. The all-new option of "tagging" individual images with their place in a folder or print service is a step backward, in my opinion.
